We've never seen a more rapt group of people hovering over salt-crusted sea bass.

To kick off season 2 of Anthony Bourdain: Parts Unknown, CNN hosted a whirlwind scavenger hunt in Hong Kong last weekend, in association with Little Adventures in Hong Kong, the city's premier private food tour company.

We sent 12 teams racing through restaurants, streets and market stalls on an intense foodie-themed series of challenges, with Anthony Bourdain judging the challenge remotely via Instagram and Twitter.

Chefs and judges were stationed at various locations to preside over each endeavor.

Sweet odds

It may have been the one in six odds of winning, but the race was hilariously intense from the beginning. With challenges ranging from eating as many "suicide wings" as possible in three minutes to wrapping dim sum to fileting fish, six local teams and six expat teams battled it out to win two grand prizes of a trip to Tokyo, and customized food tours of Hong Kong with Little Adventures for runners up.

Anthony Bourdain judged the roast goose leg challenge -- it's his favorite Hong Kong food -- that had teams hunting for a secret kitchen to chop up goose legs.

"You really get to see why Hong Kong is Asia's food capital," food blogger Andy Yeo of team The Twits said of the day's event. "It pushes you off the deep end."

Hunger in Hong Kong

The tests weren't all about taste buds.

The Market Challenge had each team heading to the street market to bargain for as much choi sum (a leafy green vegetable) as possible for HK$30, the average amount people in Hong Kong living under the poverty line spend on food each day.

The veggies were then donated to Feeding Hong Kong, CNN's charity partner for the event.

Social media was another important element of the contest, as contestants were required to have a Twitter and Instagram account to register.

Despite rampant competitiveness, CNN Travel editor Hiufu Wong observed that contestants spent more time feeding the event to their social media networks than on the actual challenges.

The winners

The winners heading to Tokyo are teams HELL YEAH! and HUNGER HUNTER.

"We liked the fact that the challenge covered not just local Cantonese food," said Davis Ng, member of team HELL YEAH! "It covered different genres and we actually learned something very interesting from the chefs."

You're welcome, Davis. Have fun in Japan!
